The Big Bad Bank Receives Support by the Web Community

The big bad Bank documentary series announced today that they have been receiving unprecedented support by members of the online community

Boulder, Colorado-September 15, 2009-The popular documentary series The Big Bad Bank, has been seeing a large influx of viewers support and positive opinion. The viewership of documentary clips and videos published online has dramatically increased over the past months, and has proven an effective marketing tool shown by individuals reached the writing and reposting various videos and content.

Many sites including YouTube, Facebook and Twitter have been utilized by individuals companies and programs to reach their audience. One of the problems that often arise is the implement station of tracking feedback and viewership, and with the features and technologies of current social media outlet's tracking such activities is becoming increasingly more effective. The series has proven to be an online sensation, shown by viewership ratings and subsequent re-threading.

George Hunt, the host of The Big Bad Bank commented on such practices saying, "It's great to see people who support your cause especially something as important as this is and the viewers of my videos are doing just that, supporting anyway that they can. Some are commenting and rating the videos, some people and organizations are donating to the cause, and some YouTubers and fellow social media practitioners are re-threading and reposting links and videos that I created. It's the ultimate form of flattery; it feels good when people support your cause."

The Big Bad Bank has a variety of online content including videos, blogs and social media profiles. George Hunt has been producing documentaries since the early 80s about the banking elites and the concept of the World Bank. Throughout the years he has received an amazing amount of support from peer groups, professionals, and viewers for his efforts. Recently he was interviewed for truTV due of his expertise in the banking and finance field. George Washington Hunt and The Big Bad Bank are headquartered at <http://www.thebigbadbank.com>
